THE BUSINESS

A Fethiye business built around the whole home

A property relationship can begin with a viewing and continue long after the keys change hands. Angel Homes has organised its business around that longer journey, combining estate agency, design and construction, holiday lettings and home maintenance in the Fethiye area of Turkey. The home is the common thread, but the work changes at each stage.

A Fethiye business built around the whole home

Established in 2004, the family-run company is rooted in the local market rather than operating solely as a distant introducer. Its agency base in Hisarönü, opposite the post office and near the Monday market square, gives the business a recognisable place within the area it serves. That local presence is part of its practical proposition to overseas clients.

The geography includes Ovacık, Hisarönü, Çalış, Faralya and the wider Fethiye region. These are different settings, with different relationships to the coast, town life and surrounding landscape. A buyer's idea of a home in the sun becomes more useful when it is connected with the everyday character of a particular neighbourhood.

Angel Homes works with both new-build and resale properties, including homes from other developers as well as its own projects. That gives the agency a broader role than simply selling the output of its construction activity. A client can begin with the place and the intended way of living, then consider which kind of property best fits the brief.

For some, an existing home will provide the most immediate answer. Its arrangement, outlook and surroundings can be experienced directly. For others, the appeal lies in developing a property around a more individual set of requirements, with decisions about the layout and design made before the building is complete.

Design and construction are therefore central to the company's identity. Its work includes apartment complexes and villas, with bespoke projects in places such as Faralya, Hisarönü and Ovacık. Relationships with local architects, engineers and construction teams provide the disciplines required to turn a personal ambition into a defined project.

The useful beginning is the way the home will be used. A full-time residence, a family holiday base and a property intended for lettings can call for different priorities. Storage, access, the relationship between indoor and outdoor areas and the demands of maintenance deserve attention alongside the view from the terrace.

A construction brief makes those questions explicit. The client can explore how rooms should connect, where the daily gathering places should be and how the house should sit within its plot. The value of the design process is not only in adding attractive features, but in making the whole arrangement serve a coherent purpose.

The lettings and maintenance side extends the relationship into occupation. Angel Rentals works with properties in Ovacık, Hisarönü, Fethiye and Çalış, handling the practical requirements of preparing and running a home for guests. Cleaning, laundry, transfers and welcome arrangements form part of that service.

Those functions show why the company's combined model can be useful. A property that looks compelling at a viewing still needs to be looked after between visits. If it welcomes holiday guests, the experience depends on a continuing programme of preparation and follow-up rather than the design of the building alone.

The multilingual team works in Turkish, English, Russian and Arabic, reflecting a client base that may be making decisions across language and distance. Clear communication becomes part of the service itself, especially when a project involves several professional disciplines or an owner who is not permanently in the area.

Angel Homes' individual story lies in that breadth of involvement within one locality. It connects the first idea of a home with the people who design, sell, prepare and maintain it. For a client, the attraction is continuity: a relationship that can remain useful as the property moves from a plan or a viewing into everyday life.

PEOPLE

Meet the Angels team

A property business is easier to understand when its responsibilities have names. Angel Homes' team spans leadership, sales, customer service, holiday rentals, property operations and accounting. Together those roles describe a company that remains involved beyond the moment a buyer chooses a home.

Meet the Angels team

Abdulgafur Togluk, CEO · Angel Homes

Abdulgafur Togluk is Chief Executive Officer and Emin Togluk is Executive Director. Their positions sit within the leadership of the family-run business, whose activities combine construction, estate agency and the practical management of homes. Keeping those functions connected is important to the company's character, because one client's relationship may pass through several of them.

Donna Hamilton is Sales Manager. The sales role begins with understanding a client's priorities, but it also requires a clear view of the properties and areas under consideration. A useful shortlist is not simply a collection of similar prices; it should help the buyer recognise the differences that will matter after the initial excitement of a viewing.

Sales Executives Cagla Oflazoglu, Tracy Eastham and Mert Ayhan add to that client-facing team. Their work sits within a portfolio that includes both new-build and resale homes around Fethiye. The breadth of the offering means the conversation can begin with the client's needs rather than being confined to one development or one type of building.

Local knowledge has a practical value in those discussions. The character of a street, the relationship with nearby amenities and the feel of an area at different times can all influence whether a home suits someone. An estate-agency service becomes more useful when it can connect the property itself with that wider setting.

Denise Toraman works in Customer Services and Holiday Rental. That role introduces the next stage of the relationship: the home as a place that someone will actually use, or a property that will welcome other guests. Questions about preparation and service can be quite different from the questions that dominated the purchase.

Ahmet is listed within Holiday Rentals and Property Operation. The operational side concerns the practical continuity of the home, particularly when an owner is away. A guest's experience depends on a property being ready, maintained and understandable, not only attractively photographed when it was first placed on the market.

Dilek Isıldak works in Accounting. Financial administration provides another form of continuity across the business's different activities. A construction project, a sale and an ongoing rental relationship each involve information that needs to be organised clearly, giving the client and the company a workable record of the service.

The wider design-and-build activity brings local architects, engineers and construction teams into the picture. These are separate professional disciplines, each contributing a part of the project. The agency's knowledge of the client's aims needs to connect with the technical decisions that determine what can be constructed and how the home will function.

Meet the Angels team

Language is another part of the team's usefulness. Angel Homes identifies Turkish, English, Russian and Arabic within its service. A client working across borders may be discussing both a personal preference and a technical question; being able to communicate those clearly helps keep the project grounded in what the person actually means.

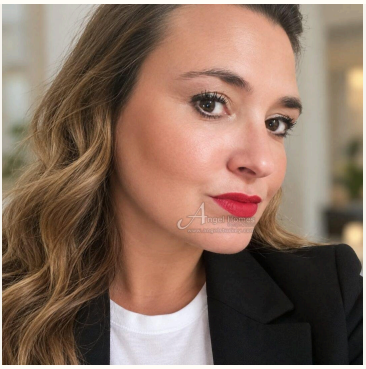

The two operating settings also reflect the range of work. The Hisarönü office provides a point for property enquiries, while the rentals team is associated with Nefes Breakfast Restaurant in Ovacık.

They connect the public-facing agency with the more continuing rhythm of looking after homes and guests.

The collective picture is of a team organised around stages of the property relationship. Leadership, sales, customer care and operations are different responsibilities, but the client should be able to recognise a continuing thread between them. The home becomes more than a completed transaction when the people behind the service remain part of its next chapter.

DESIGN & BUILD

Designing a home for the way it will be used

The most important decision in a bespoke home is often made before a particular material or finish is chosen. It is the decision about how the place should work. Angel Homes' design-and-build activity begins with that broader brief, connecting a client's ambitions with the practical possibilities of a site and a construction project.

Designing a home for the way it will be used

Fethiye and its surrounding areas offer different settings for that conversation. A villa in Faralya may be considered in relation to landscape and outlook, while a home in Hisarönü or Ovacık may be chosen for a different balance of access and daily activity. The place should help shape the brief rather than serve only as a backdrop to a standard house.

The intended pattern of occupation is equally important. A family using a home for several weeks at a time may want different storage and social spaces from someone planning to live there throughout the year. A property that will also welcome holiday guests introduces another set of practical questions about preparation, use and maintenance.

A good plan makes those priorities visible. The route from kitchen to terrace, the position of a bedroom and the relationship between shared and private areas influence daily life more consistently than a single decorative feature. Designing them together gives the house a coherent rhythm rather than a collection of individually attractive rooms.

Outdoor space is part of that rhythm. A pool, garden or terrace can become a principal living setting, but it also needs to relate sensibly to the interior. Where people sit, how they move between shade and sun and how the space is looked after all belong within the same conversation.

Designing a home for the way it will be used

Angel Homes' work with local architects and engineers brings different expertise to those decisions. The architectural idea needs a technical response, and the construction team needs clear information from which to work. The client's brief becomes more useful as it develops from a general aspiration into decisions that can be coordinated.

The company's experience includes apartment complexes as well as individual villas. That broadens the design question beyond one type of home. Shared areas, access and the relationship between neighbouring properties can become important parts of an apartment project, while an individual villa may allow a different degree of control over the plot and arrangement.

Choosing an existing home presents another route. The buyer can experience a finished layout and consider how well it fits the intended use. A resale property may offer qualities that are difficult to reproduce in a new project, while also inviting a different discussion about changes, maintenance and the way the owner wants to settle in.

The rental and maintenance service gives the company a perspective on what happens after the design decisions have been made. Preparing a property for guests brings attention to durable choices, clear operation and the practical routines of cleaning and laundry. A home that is straightforward to run can provide a better experience for both the owner and the people staying there.

Designing a home for the way it will be used

This is where the construction and service sides of the business can inform one another. The person thinking about a room's appearance is not the only person with a useful view; those who will maintain it or prepare it for the next stay can identify details that affect its everyday success. A considered project makes space for those perspectives early enough to matter.

For an overseas owner, continuity is particularly valuable. Questions may arise when the person is far from the property, and a local service can help connect the next decision with the history of the home. The relationship is strongest when the initial ambition remains understandable to the people providing support later.

The result should be a home whose pleasures are supported by its practical arrangement. A generous terrace, a comfortable bedroom and an inviting living space become more satisfying when they work together naturally. That is the real promise of a thoughtful brief: a property shaped around the life it is intended to hold.
