THE BUSINESS

A business built around the broker

A yacht sale begins with a personal relationship. A broker learns how an owner uses a boat, what a buyer hopes to do next and where the two might meet. United Yacht Sales has built its business around supporting that relationship, placing a central organisation behind a geographically dispersed network of individual brokers.

A business built around the broker

Peter Schmidt founded the company in 2002 after a long career in the marine industry. Rather than make the central office the whole story, the model gave brokers a shared structure for the work surrounding a transaction. Administration, marketing, technology and closing support could be organised together while the broker concentrated on clients and boats.

That distinction is important in a market where local knowledge remains valuable. The demands of a cruising yacht in Florida are not identical to those of a sportfishing boat further up the coast or a vessel based in another country. A broker's experience of particular boats, yards and cruising grounds can matter as much as the reach of the company's name.

The headquarters in Stuart, Florida, provides a physical centre for that network. The address on SW Atlanta Avenue places United within a region deeply connected with boating, while the broker directory reaches much further. Its location-based search allows a reader to start with a place or a person rather than an undifferentiated list of inventory.

Clint Boutwell is the company's owner and chief executive. In a company history message dated April 2026, he sets out a business focused on giving brokers the resources of a larger organisation without requiring them to surrender their own professional identity. That is a useful way to understand United's scale: a common platform supporting many individual working relationships.

A business built around the broker

The platform includes marketing across multiple listing services. That broadens the ways in which a yacht can be discovered, but exposure is only one part of a sale. The listing still needs to describe the right vessel, images need to show it clearly, and enquiries have to reach someone who understands the details. Distribution and expertise have to work together.

The range of boats creates another challenge. United's public search separates inventory by brand, type, location, price and length, with additional routes for small yachts and custom sportfishing boats. Those categories reflect the very different questions buyers bring. Some are comparing long-range accommodation; others care more about fishing arrangements, handling or the practicalities of a particular marina berth.

There is also a new-yacht side to the business. The website provides routes to builders and brands including Amer, Aquitalia, Century, French Yachts, Hatteras, Sunpower and Vela Boatworks. A new-build enquiry follows a different rhythm from buying an existing vessel: specifications, delivery planning and decisions about equipment can become part of the conversation much earlier.

A business built around the broker

Across both markets, the transaction itself depends on less visible work. Documents must be assembled, information checked and the steps towards closing coordinated. United's dedicated support staff give those tasks named owners. The broker remains the client's familiar contact, but does not have to perform every administrative function alone.

The model also explains why the company invests in tools for brokers. A usable system can reduce duplicated effort, keep information moving and give a smaller local operation access to a broader audience. That support becomes especially valuable when the broker is travelling, showing boats or dealing with clients in several locations.

What makes United interesting is this combination of independence and shared infrastructure. The business is large enough to support a network, yet the client usually experiences it through one professional relationship. Its central challenge is to preserve the usefulness of both: the reach of the organisation and the accountability of the individual.

More than two decades after its founding, the underlying idea remains recognisable. A good yacht business needs people who understand boats, but those people also need a dependable structure around them. United's story lies in the meeting of those two needs—and in the many different careers and local markets that now sit within its network.

PEOPLE

The people who keep a sale moving

The broker may be the person at the viewing, but a yacht transaction reaches many other desks before it is complete. United Yacht Sales' support team covers leadership, listings, marketing, documentation and closing. Meeting those people gives a more useful picture of the business than a headline about its size alone.

The people who keep a sale moving

Teresa Duncan, yacht listings manager · United Yacht Sales

Clint Boutwell leads the company as owner and chief executive. Kevin Zimmermann is President and Yacht Broker, a combination of roles that connects the leadership of the organisation with the work of selling boats. Between them sits the central question for a brokerage network: how to give individual brokers effective support while keeping the overall business coordinated.

The support team is based around practical disciplines. Teresa Duncan is Yacht Listings Manager, a role at the point where a boat becomes a public proposition. A listing has to turn information supplied about a vessel into something a prospective buyer can search, compare and understand. The accuracy and organisation of that material affect everything that follows.

A buyer browsing by length, brand or location sees a structured set of choices. Behind that apparent simplicity are specifications, photographs, descriptions and changes that need to be handled consistently. A yacht may be represented by an individual broker, but its public information is also part of the company's wider inventory and marketing system.

Elliot Brownstein works in marketing, while Mary Lakyn Boutwell's role combines marketing and sales. Their disciplines sit between the detail of the boat and the audience likely to be interested in it. Marketing a sportfishing vessel calls for a different emphasis from presenting a family cruising yacht, even when both appear within the same search platform.

The people who keep a sale moving

Photographs and copy begin that process, but distribution extends it. United's network uses multiple listing services as part of its reach. The useful question is not simply how many places can display a boat; it is whether the information arrives clearly and whether a prospective buyer can move from interest to a productive conversation with the broker.

Closing has a team of its own. Jeffrey Nelms is In-House Closing Coordinator. Ember Groves and Sandy Battrick are Yacht Closing Agents. Coralie Bennefield is identified separately as an Independent Closing and Vessel Documentation Provider. The distinction between an internal role and an independent provider is part of understanding who does what within the wider service.

These are the people whose work becomes particularly important when an agreement begins to turn into a completed transaction. Documents, deadlines and communication have to be brought together. A client's excitement about a boat does not remove the need for careful follow-through, and a broker benefits from colleagues who focus on those steps every day.

Wendy Petree is Executive Assistant, another role concerned with continuity. In a business with many brokers and a wide geographic footprint, organisation is a service in its own right. A question needs to find the right person; a decision needs to be followed up; the next stage must not depend on someone remembering a conversation in isolation.

The people who keep a sale moving

The broker network adds a much larger cast. The public directory includes people working in different states and markets, with individual biographies that explain their backgrounds. Some clients will begin with a particular boating region, while others will seek someone experienced in a type of vessel. The directory makes those individual identities visible within the United name.

Our accompanying broker register brings together the profiles available in that public directory on 15 November 2026. It is a way to explore the people, then follow through to the company's current biographies. Names alone cannot convey a whole career, but they make a dispersed business tangible and give readers a starting point beyond the central office.

The collective picture is of a service built in layers. A broker develops the relationship, listings and marketing help communicate the boat, and closing specialists organise the steps towards completion. When those disciplines work together, the client can concentrate on the decision that brought them there in the first place: what to buy, what to sell and what life on the water should look like next.

BUYING & SELLING

From first shortlist to the next chapter afloat

A buyer can open a yacht website in seconds and spend weeks deciding what the results mean. Length, price and builder are useful starting points, but they do not explain how a boat will fit a particular life. United Yacht Sales' combination of searchable inventory and individual brokers addresses that gap between finding a vessel and understanding whether it is the right one.

From first shortlist to the next chapter afloat

The first decision is often about use. A family planning coastal weekends may have different priorities from an owner preparing for longer passages. Accommodation matters, but so do access, storage, machinery and the way the cockpit or deck will be used. A successful shortlist begins with those practical ambitions rather than the most striking photograph.

United's search tools allow boats to be explored by type, brand, location, length and price. Each filter answers a different question. Location affects the logistics of an inspection and a future move. Type helps separate very different forms of boating. Price frames the purchase, while the continuing demands of ownership remain part of the wider conversation.

Sportfishing illustrates why specialist knowledge matters. A buyer interested in that world may focus on cockpit arrangements, equipment and the way a boat supports a day offshore. Someone considering a cruising motor yacht may place more weight on the distribution of cabins, the saloon and the relationship between interior and exterior living spaces. A broker has to recognise the difference before presenting options.

From first shortlist to the next chapter afloat

The company's directory makes it possible to start with that human element. A prospective client can look for a broker near a location or explore an individual's biography. The practical benefit is the opportunity to ask more precise questions: what to inspect first, how to compare apparently similar boats and which compromises are likely to matter after the purchase.

For a seller, the process runs in the other direction. An existing yacht has to be described in a way that helps the right buyer understand her. Clear specifications and photographs are essential, but so is an informed explanation of what distinguishes the boat. The broker's knowledge and the central listings team's organisation meet in that public presentation.

Marketing then carries the listing beyond the immediate relationship. United's multi-platform approach can place the boat in front of readers searching through different channels. A coherent listing helps the same vessel remain recognisable across those routes, while enquiries return to the people responsible for explaining her properly.

An agreement is a milestone rather than the end of the work. The closing and documentation teams become part of the sequence, coordinating information and helping the transaction progress through its practical stages. The existence of dedicated people for those functions is one of the clearest expressions of the company's broker-support model.

From first shortlist to the next chapter afloat

The website also provides routes to services such as finance, closing support and extended warranties. These are distinct questions, each requiring its own terms and suitability to be considered. Bringing the routes together makes the breadth of the ownership process visible: choosing the boat is central, but it sits within a larger set of decisions.

New yachts introduce a further layer of choice. United presents several builders and brands, giving clients a route into projects that may involve selecting layouts and equipment rather than evaluating one existing specification. The appeal is different from the pre-owned market, as is the timing of the decisions. A broker's job is to help the client understand which path fits the intended programme.

Boat shows provide another useful meeting point. United's website follows events including Fort Lauderdale, Stuart, Miami and Palm Beach, places where clients can compare boats and meet people in person. Seeing several vessels close together can clarify priorities that are difficult to resolve from a screen: headroom, access, proportions and the atmosphere of a room.

From first shortlist to the next chapter afloat

Ultimately, the value of a brokerage service lies in turning a large field of possibilities into a considered next step. United's scale provides reach, but the choice remains personal. The most interesting outcome is not the largest boat or the longest list of features; it is a vessel that makes sense for the owner and opens the next chapter of their time afloat.
